I. SWOT's application

Recall SWOT stands for strength, weakness, opportunity and threat. Whilst strength and weakness are internal attributes; opportunity and threat are external factors. For example, acquired and potential competitive advantage can be seen as a type of strength and opportunity. Competitive advantage competing goods merits possesses five indices: 1) market share 2) quality performance 3) customer loyalty 4) distribution 5) knowledge worker. As for the external factors, weakness can be seen as the area of improvement; whereas threat can be seen as the corporate's contingent measures. Contingent measure refers to the response to emergency in the predicted/unpredicted future.

II. Managerial styles

preference

Vincent-Hoper et al. (2012) portrayed transformational leaders engaging, inspiring

as managers who advance and propel their followers by transform --> change into smt transformational leaders wish to change its team members into smt better

anticipating and communicating appealing visions, common goals, and shared values, as well as by setting an illustration of the requested behavior.

Facets of transformational leadership are: idealized influence (idealized attribution and idealized behavior), inspirational motivation, intellectual stimulation, and

motivate their members via incentives (bonus, rewards, etc.)

Transactional leadership contains among other things, an transaction = a deal = exchange exchange process (between leader & follower) that results in adherent compliance to leader demands, but it is not expected to create zeal and commitment to an errand objective (Trottier et al., 2008). The transactional leadership style constituted a constructive style labeled “contingent reward” and a corrective style labeled “management-by-exception.”² encourage their members to be more competent: i.e., self-actualizing (freedom) leave it alone (french)

The last style is laissez-faire, which is characterized by non-involvement, showing indifference, being absent when needed, overlooking achievements and problems as well. It is a style of leadership in which leaders offer very little direction and allow group members to make decisions on their own (Bass and Riggio, 2006; Koech & Namusonge, 2012; Solomon, 2016).³

Q. What is your favorite managerial style?

write down your reason as well pick from tranformational, transactional, laissez-faire managerial styles.
